After Lotto, the South African national lottery, was launched on 2 March 2000 with 6000 outlets selling lottery tickets, both the press and the public had not spared the role players their criticism. From day one, the national lottery was the target of, in some instances, an ill-informed public. One example was the general belief by the public in the early days that all the monies allocated for good causes were for charity only. In addition, nobody knew, until much later, how small the percentage earmarked for charity really was. These and other issues continually evoked an emotional response and ensured that the national lottery featured regularly in all forms of the media. One website even went so far as to call it "the national robbery".
